Question	Answer
01	Yes a definition gives status and therefore scope for credence and a basic starting point for work towards solutions to a problem
02	Yes autism is multi-faceted and as likely to incorporate many and various challenges healthwise as any other complex mental or physical state.
03	Yes we are all familiar and comfortable with these organisations surely this is best?
04	Yes otherwise stalling will continue instead of action
05	six months is reasonable and better than never but individuals will suffer by this procrastination so if possible it would be better to have the autism strategy written now and put into effect immediately alternatively if a preparation timescale is needed
06	as above
07	as above
08	a set timescale is fairer for such an important diagnosis
09	Yes this is a reasonable and understandable time to wait taking organisational work involved
10	Yes yes but only if this is flexible and crucial people are not excluded
11	each case must be considered by all appropriate people for the case
12	autistic people who are unable to present themselves for help which includes both children and adults will not be helped perhaps until crisis point occurs which is cruel and lacks equality and is very likely unless autism is given more status eg in educational and health set-ups.

13	Not sure
14	also if they were born in this country ie UK to avoid overburdening by cost any system that is funded by UK public taxes thus weakening the effectiveness of the system post Brexit
15	It should be written in the guidance. the guidance has legal status?
16	Yes freedom of information
17	It should happen all the time. any government must be loosely capable to help all people understand one another at all times
18	if it costs anything the cost should be met universally and since it is a good and fair idea this should be no problem
19	it is a return to the workhouse to consider leaving the fate of autistic individuals and their families officially unrecognised in law and of particular concern when considering the effect of exit from the protection of the European Union with regard to
