European Commission

The Commission has published ‘Brexit preparedness notes’ on the legal and practical implications of the withdrawal of the United Kingdom from the European Union - subject to any transitional arrangement that may be contained in a possible withdrawal agreement.

26 November: Questions and Answers - the rights of EU and UK citizens, as outlined in the Withdrawal Agreement.

27 November: New report provides further evidence of link between trade and jobs. In 2017 UK exports to the rest of the world supported 4.2 million jobs.

27 November: Brexit preparedness: provisional agreement reached on amending EU rules in the area of type-approvals for vehicles.
I come to border controls. There are indeed flexibility rules for certain types of checks that can be made, subject to securing the containers between the exit of the tunnel and the point at which the checks will be made. We are currently discussing with the French authorities, on the one hand, to make sure that these flexibility rules are properly used in accordance with European law and on the other hand to give these authorities and operators the necessary legal certainty. The situation will be difficult and will require absolutely considerable infrastructure work, but all the existing possibilities of flexibility will be used and we really support the French authorities in this matter. There is, however, one important flaw in terms of flexibility: it concerns veterinary and phytosanitary controls, given the major risk posed by these imports for animal health and the safety and health protection status (SPS) of the importing State. And first of all France, which is the point of entry for imports. Nobody wants, obviously, that new cases of crazy cows appear in France simply because of too light controls. Veterinary checks will therefore remain extremely strict. …

With regard to border inspection posts, there will be no derogations. What types of border controls are we talking about? The most stringent border controls are veterinary controls. And again, we have to distinguish between products of animal origin and live animals. Products of animal origin must be subject to three types of control. A documentary check - you have to know what happens in the container - an identity check - we were told that these were boxes of corned beef, but is it really? - and a physical check - opening the boxes, looking at what’s inside, doing lab tests and making sure it’s not dangerous to the consumer’s health. Let us never forget that the United Kingdom still has very important trade flows with many third countries. So we are not just ensuring the status and the respect of the rules of hygiene of what is produced in the United Kingdom but also of what is imported from all over the world. There is a real health safety issue. Of these three controls, only the first two are absolutely systematic. The third one, which is really time consuming and really complex - opening the box of corned beef and doing tests in the lab - depends on the risk, which is analyzed according to the nature of the product. This control can also, however, be extremely limited, especially for products really coming from the United Kingdom. It is therefore not necessary to over dramatize the question of controls.

As for the control of products that are not of animal origin, it can very well be done at the point of arrival of the shipment rather than the port. However, precautionary measures may be taken, such as affixing seals, to ensure that the cargo is not handled between the time of entry into the EU and verification.

It is on the control of living animals that we are most strict. Few British and New Zealand sheep arrive at our borders but, given the seriousness of the diseases they may carry, the ease with which they can be transmitted and the impact they would have immediately on the exports of France - Should contamination ever affect the SPS status of the territory, we can not afford to give up these controls. It will therefore not be possible to derogate from or amend the applicable legislation at European level. On the other hand, we will naturally be able to show all the necessary flexibility for the least dangerous products, in particular by using the possibility of making these remote controls of the entrance.

27 November: ECMT permit applications open this week: international hauliers must apply - or miss out (FTA).

27 November: WTO agrees in principle to keep Britain in procurement deal - Although the “agreement in principle” appears to put Britain on track for post-Brexit membership of the GPA, it still needs to ratify the treaty. That requires 21 sitting days of parliament, meaning that the GPA terms need to be finalised by the end of January to make the Brexit day of March 29, 2019. A Geneva trade official said the GPA parties could meet again in December if they are ready. (Reuters)
